At-a-glance summary of findings

• At a time when the numbers of displaced and refugees have hit an all-time high, Islamist groups have carried out religiously motivated ethnic cleansing of Christians notably in parts of Africa and the Middle East. If this continues, the Church’s survival in these regions is threatened.

• The fear of genocide – in many cases well-founded – has prompted an exodus of Christians, notably from the Middle East and parts of Africa.

• As a result of this exodus, Christianity is on course to disappear from Iraq possibly within five years – unless emergency help is provided at an international level on a massively increased scale.

• A huge exodus of Christians from other parts of the Middle East, such as Syria, combined with increasing pressures on the faithful in Saudi Arabia and Iran, means that the Church is being silenced and driven out of its ancient biblical heartland.

• The rise of militant Islamist groups in Nigeria, Sudan, Kenya, Tanzania and other parts of Africa is destabilizing the Christian presence on the one continent which until now has been the Church’s brightest hope for the future.

• Christians have been targeted by nationalist religious movements – Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist – many of which see Christianity increasingly as a foreign ‘colonial’ import. Christians are viewed with suspicion and are seen as linked to the West, which is perceived as corrupt and exploitative.

• The decline of Christianity in many countries of concern may significantly damage prospects for peace in regions where Church leaders and others have played important roles in education, community development and inter-faith cooperation.

• Totalitarian regimes, including China, have put increasing pressures on Christianity, which is perceived as a threat not least because of its growing ‘underground’ support.
Foreword by Archbishop Jean-Clement Jeanbart, Melkite Greek Catholic Archbishop of Aleppo, Syria

Nothing therefore can come between us and the love of Christ, even if we are troubled or worried, or being persecuted, or lacking food or clothes, or being threatened or even attacked. As scripture promised: For your sake we are being massacred daily, and reckoned as sheep for the slaughter. These are the trials through which we triumph, by the power of him who loved us. (Romans 8:35-37 JB)

St. Paul, who was converted in Syria and baptized, confirmed and ordained by our Church in Damascus, seems to prophetically address our dramatic situation today. Troubles, persecution, lack of food and clothes, threats and attacks – this describes the lot of those, in so many countries, who cling to their Faith in our risen Lord Jesus Christ.

In my Diocese of Aleppo, in northern Syria, we are on the front-line of this suffering. My own cathedral has been bombed six times and is now unusable. My home has also been hit more than 10 times. We are facing the rage of an extremist jihad; we may disappear soon. In both Syria and Iraq, Christian communities—along with other vulnerable minorities—are defenseless against assaults by Daesh (ISIS). We are the prime target of the so-called caliphate’s religious cleansing campaign. Across the region, Christians and other minorities are often caught up in the fighting, facing calamities as they are displaced, with scant provisions for shelter, food, and medical assistance. Truly we are “reckoned as sheep for the slaughter.”

We “are being massacred daily” and other Christians are, too. Extremist jihad has swept through Nigeria; in Sri Lanka religious extremism of another kind attacks minority faiths – including Christians; and so on. In Aid to the Church in Need’s Persecuted and Forgotten? report you will find a spotlight shone on the situation in all of these countries, and the problems the faithful face are revealed. Our faith in Christ Jesus, our shared humanity, demands that we listen to the stories of those who suffer for the beliefs we share. Their story is our story.

Despite our problems here in the Middle East, we are doing everything we can to help those who lack food, clothes, or other essentials. By God’s grace, and with the continuing help of organizations such as Aid to the Church in Need, we have been able to respond to the urgent needs of our people.

We are confronting one of the most important challenges of our 2,000-year history. We will fight with all our strength and act with all available means to give our people reasons to stay and not to leave; we know the road ahead will be very hard; nevertheless, we are convinced that our beloved Lord Jesus is present in His Church and will never abandon us. We know that nothing can come between us and the love of Christ – and that through all these trials we triumph through the power of Him who loves us.

India: Protest over Church attacks forcibly broken up

March 2015: Police in India were accused of heavy-handedly removing protestors taking part in a peaceful demonstration against a rise in attacks on churches and assaults on Christians. Protester Father Dennis George said police descended after 500 people gathered at the gate of the city’s Sacred Heart Cathedral. Speaking to Aid to the Church in Need, the priest of the New Delhi Archdiocese described how he tried to intervene when he witnessed “police roughing up people and dragging even women into vans.” But Father George was then seized himself: “Three policemen tried to drag me away. But I resisted. Then, half a dozen of them lifted me up – with one even choking me by the neck – and put me in the police bus.”

Executive Summary

Down narrow alleys flanked on either side by simple brick dwellings, the sound of grief could be heard. Women swathed in black screamed. In between their cries could be heard the sobbing of the men. Nobody could quite believe such a tragedy could befall their tight-knit farming community. El-Aour, a mostly Christian village in the Minya governorate in Egypt, was hardest hit by one of the worst acts of hatred against Christians in modern times. As described in greater detail on page 19, Islamist terror group Daesh (ISIS) released a video of the beheading of 20 Egyptian Coptic Christian migrant workers kidnapped in Libya. Thirteen of the 20 Coptic men shown in orange jump suits kneeling in front of their killers came from El-Aour. When their families back home saw the video released on Feb.12, 2015, they were horror-struck. Bushra Fawzi spotted his son, Shenouda, among those kneeling on the Libyan seashore. Bushra said: “He is my first and eldest son, my first joy and happiness. I want his body back. If they dumped it in the sea, I want it back. If they set fire to it, I want its dust.”

It is for Shenouda, his family and countless others that Aid to the Church in Need, the Catholic charity for suffering Christians, has produced the 2015 edition of Persecuted and Forgotten? A Report on Christians oppressed for their Faith.

The full report, which is available at www.acnusa.org/persecution, shows that the period under review – October 2013 to July 2015 – has been catastrophic for many Christians in the regions where persecution is worst. They are not the only ones to have suffered, nor have they necessarily fallen victim to the single worst acts of persecution, but, taken as a whole, more Christians have been targeted than any other religious group. Worse still, the impact of this deepening cycle of persecution has created the most significant exodus of Christian faithful in the religion’s history.

Persecution has emerged as a key factor in a global upsurge of forcibly displaced people. The numbers of internally displaced people and refugees abroad hit an all-time record high of nearly 60 million in 2014, according to the UN. With people fleeing their homes as never before, Christians are fast disappearing from entire regions – most notably a huge chunk of the Middle East but also whole dioceses in Africa. In large part, this migration is the product of an ethnic cleansing motivated by religious hatred. This systematic violence and intimidation is to a large degree the work of militant Islamists – terror groups which seem to have appeared out of nowhere and exercise a might and a cruelty far greater than that of the radical organizations from which they have sprung.

Daesh and other movements have acted strategically to instil a fear of genocide, a threat made real by the massacre of specific Christian groups. Such savage acts, captured on video, and broadcast to the world, have been proof enough of the Islamists’ intent to force Christians out of regions which have fallen to the extremists. Be it in Syria, Iraq, Nigeria or parts of east Africa, the growing threat of militant Muslim groups – notably Daesh – has prompted hundreds of thousands to flee. It is a primary cause of the contraction of Christianity – changing from being a global faith to a regional one, with the faithful increasingly absent from ever-widening areas. This is set in the context of an overall growth in the total Christian population which within a century has nearly quadrupled to more than 2 billion.\(^4\) The regions the faithful are emigrating from are frequently those where until barely a generation ago Christians were both numerous and influential.

If the situation does not improve, Christianity is on course for extinction in many of its biblical heartlands within a generation, if not before. The prognosis for the Church’s survival in parts of Africa is almost as bad.

Research methodology – separating facts from conjecture

This report – Persecuted and Forgotten? – assesses both the nature of the threats to Christians and the underlying causes. It identifies trends and, where possible, predicts future developments. The report assesses the situation in 22 countries. In the majority of cases, the countries are selected as being among the worst perpetrators of hatred against Christians: North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Eritrea, Pakistan and Sudan are among those worth highlighting in this context. But the report also examines other countries where oppression of Christians is less severe. These countries, notably Russia, are assessed in the light of their political and wider cultural significance; their governments’ approach to religious freedom in general and Christians in particular has a regional and even global impact.

Selective rather than comprehensive, the reports for each country under review are broken down into two parts. First, there is an analysis of the key facts and figures which form the essential background to any assessment of religious freedom. This overview of political (constitutional), economic and cultural phenomena provides the foundation of an assessment of the all-important indicators of change and continuity which are the ultimate focus of the report. This analysis is followed by incident reports. Varying considerably in the level of detail, these reports provide noteworthy persecution case studies. The criteria for selection include any individual or group suffering harassment, oppression or worse in ways that impact upon their access to religious freedom. Incident reports cover all mainstream Christian denominations and other religions.

Growing establishment recognition of the scale of persecution was reinforced by events during the reporting period, notably attacks on Christians by Daesh. In November 2014, at the UK launch of Aid to the Church in Need’s Religious Freedom in the World Report, HRH the Prince of Wales said in a video message: “The horrible and heart-breaking events in Iraq and Syria have brought the subject of religious freedom and persecution to the forefront of the world news.”\(^10\)

80 percent of persecution is against Christians

Global statistics regarding persecuted Christians bear out the severity of the violence and oppression directed against them. Even before the reporting period, research had established that Christians were by far the most persecuted faith group. In summer 2012, the International Society for Human Rights, based in Frankfurt, Germany, estimated that 80 percent of all acts of religious discrimination were against Christians.\(^5\) In terms of outright persecution, the Commission of the Bishops’ Conferences of the European Community (COMECE), reported that 75 percent was against Christians.\(^6\)

While controversy surrounded reports that up to 150,000 Christians were being killed for their faith every year,\(^7\) there was a growing consensus that oppression against them had become increasingly severe. At an Easter reception in Downing Street in April 2014, British Prime Minister David Cameron stated that Christianity “is now the most persecuted religion around the world.\(^8\)" echoing statements in November 2012 by Germany’s Chancellor Angela Merkel.\(^9\)

Iraq: Set free by Daesh (ISIS)

August 2014: Two elderly women, captured by Daesh (ISIS) in northern Iraq, risked being killed when they refused to abandon their faith. Neighbors Victoria (pictured right) and Gazella, both 80, were left behind when their village of Karamlesh in the Nineveh plains was evacuated as the extremists approached. After four days, they were discovered by the militants who frogmarched them to St Barbara’s Hill on the edge of the village where they joined 10 other Christians. When they were ordered to convert to Islam, Victoria and Gazella refused. Gazella said: “We believe that if we show love and kindness, forgiveness and mercy we can bring about the kingdom of God on earth as well as in heaven. Paradise is about love. If you want to kill us for our faith then we are prepared to die here and now.” Daesh had no response to the women’s resolute faith and it was agreed that the remaining dozen or so Christians could go free. Victoria and Gazella fled to the nearby Kurdish capital, Erbil. A few weeks later ACN met them there in a home provided by the Church. They told their story sitting side by side on mattresses on the floor – their beds for the night. Meanwhile, other displaced Christians in Erbil, such as the elderly woman pictured above, were in displacement camps awaiting transfer to portable cabins and other more permanent accommodation being provided by Aid to the Church in Need.

The horrendous and heart-breaking events in Iraq and Syria have brought the subject of religious freedom and persecution to the forefront of the world news.

Pakistan: First woman sentenced to death for blasphemy still in prison

June 2015: A Christian woman who has been on death row for nearly five years was transferred to another prison after she became so ill she could not walk. 50-year-old Asia Bibi was reportedly vomiting blood and had difficulty eating. Lawyers for Asia gained permission for her to be transferred to a prison in Lahore where she is receiving medical treatment and is nearer her family. In April 2015, Pope Francis raised the profile of Asia’s case when he met with her husband and children and prayed for her during one of his Wednesday General Audiences. Asia was convicted of blasphemy in November 2010 after an argument over drinking water.

In July 2015 the Supreme Court of Pakistan granted a stay of execution pending an appeal which was ongoing at the time of going to press.

organizations both religious (mostly Christian) and secular. The authors of Persecuted and Forgotten? have paid close attention to selecting only reputable sources and, where possible, have corroborated their evidence against specialist knowledge by country experts within the charity itself and from material collected on ACN fact-finding trips to countries. In many of the countries under review, specific, sensitive information has been withheld for the precise reason that it may put Christians – and others – at risk. Hence, some of the conclusions drawn go further than indicated by the evidence that is presented.

This careful and thorough-going research, building on methods developed over five editions of Persecuted and Forgotten? spanning nine years, shows that the situation has deteriorated in the overwhelming majority of the countries under review. Even in the period since the last report was produced, in October 2013, the position of Christians has declined – in many cases dramatically.

Analyzing the research findings in the 22 countries in question, ACN compared religious issues facing Christians over the period 2013–15 with those in 2011–13. Factors of concern include:

• Violence against Christians – attacks on churches and Christians’ homes and businesses, kidnapping of believers for reasons connected to their faith or religious identity;
• Court cases involving Christians who suffer persecution through unjust legal processes. A key concern here are blasphemy laws;
• Political developments hindering or advancing the cause of Christians’ access to religious freedom, notably new or amended constitutions, government statements and policies – travel permits for clergy, regulations regarding church building projects, government attitudes to Christian engagement in political debate and voting rights;
• Tracking social changes affecting Christians – access to employment, education and healthcare, where social stigmatization has had the effect of making it impossible for Christians to claim their rights in spite of entitlement under the law.

Taken as a whole, however, the comparative evaluation does not aim for complete comprehensiveness. ACN’s essentially qualitative assessment, by its nature, does not provide statistics to facilitate a full comparative analysis. Also, state oppression is entirely different by nature from sporadic acts of violence – and conditions of persecution are invariably not uniform across any one particular country.
China: Church buildings and crosses targeted

April 2014 – present: On a pretext of removing illegal structures violating planning and zoning laws, a number of churches were served with demolition orders, either for external crosses or entire buildings. Speaking about the government-approved Sanjiang Church which was demolished, despite only being finished in late 2013, one Wenzhou resident said: “It was a really big building and you could see the cross on the top from miles away. I heard it made the officials angry and so they knocked it down and got rid of the evidence.” As of January 2015, there had been more than 650 incidents recorded including: whole or partial demolition of a church or church-run building; notice to remove, removal, demolition, modification or covering of a cross; and related injuries, detention, arrest or summons in connection with the demolitions. 87-year-old Bishop Zhu Weifang of Wenzhou, a member of the government-sponsored Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, called the policy “wrong and unjust,” noting that it “targets crosses on church-roofs, a sign of Christian faith.”

Persecuted and Forgotten? The principal findings

It is in this context that, in a disturbingly high number of the countries reviewed, specific groups of Christians have suffered a comprehensive denial of their human rights. The reports describe incidents that rank as crimes against humanity: they include Christians kidnapped and never seen again, others packed into metal containers under the African sun, others again tortured into admitting crimes they never committed and some even hanged or beheaded. Modern technology and social media have done much to aid the spread of such information, if not necessarily always achieving accuracy and balance. The violence against Christians in particular, and other faiths in general, was well documented in the years leading up to the period under review of this study. But in key regions, most notably parts of the Middle East, and other faiths in general, was well documented in the years leading up to the period under review of this study. But in key regions, most notably parts of the Middle East, there were also featured in the 2013 report. The 2015 report examined 22 countries, of which 19 were also featured in the 2013 report. The 2015 report examined 22 countries, of which 19 were also featured in the 2013 report.

Of the 13 countries where the situation for Christians worsened, nine saw Islamist anti-Christian violence to the fore – Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Kenya, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria. Nothing that went before could quite prepare observers of Christian persecution for the calamities that would befall the faithful from October 2013 to June 2015. A table on pages 30–31 and the accompanying map illustrate the extent to which an already grave situation had worsened. Given how much persecution had worsened in 2011–13, it is very significant that the rate of decline actually increased in the two years that followed. The 2015 report examined 22 countries, of which 19 were also featured in the 2013 Persecuted and Forgotten? report. Of those 19 countries, 15 (i.e. 79 percent) saw the situation for Christians “worsen.”

Extremist Islamism – the graven threat

It is noteworthy that all the countries new to the “extreme” category were ones which saw an upsurge in extremist Islamism. It is important to acknowledge that all faiths and none were targeted to a greater or lesser extent by radical jihadist groups, notably Daesh. In many cases, the violence should be seen as part of the growing clash between the Sunni and Shi’a branches of Islam, with Christians caught in the crossfire, alongside a host of other minority groups. But events showed that Christians were especially at risk, by the sheer number of attacks on churches and the faithful. Of the 13 countries where the situation for Christians worsened, nine saw Islamist anti-Christian violence to the fore – Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Kenya, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria. A further two – Eritrea and Turkmenistan – were countries where totalitarian regimes oppress Christians but also where there were increasing problems from growing Islamism.

The rise of extremist Islamic groups occurred not just in the Middle East, but also in parts of Africa and even on the Indian sub-continent. Of all the reports about Islamist atrocities, the one which had arguably the most impact was the fall of Mosul and the Nineveh plains to Daesh in the summer of 2014. When the Islamist terror group seized Iraq’s second city that June, they presented Christians with a choice – either convert to Islam, pay the Jizya tax or “there is nothing…but the sword.” When Daesh withdrew the option of paying the Jizya tax, almost the entire Christian community fled, leaving nearly all their possessions behind. Hundreds of thousands of others also took flight, the majority of...

them Muslims. The Christians sought sanctuary on the neighboring Nineveh plains, only to suffer the same agony again when Daesh invaded many of the towns and villages there. On the night of Aug.6, another exodus unfolded, affecting Yizidis as well as Christians. Arriving in Kurdish northern Iraq as morning broke on Aug.7 were 120,000 Christians – most of them with nothing but the clothes they were wearing.

What happened in Mosul and Nineveh may have had extensive media coverage but it was only one among many incidents of violence that pushed Christians to the brink as never before. Many faith communities suffered but, with numbers already depleted, Christians had most to lose from the massive surge in Islamist violence. The group was just beginning to make its presence felt during the time frame covered in the 2013 Persecuted and Forgotten? report, but it quickly became clear that Daesh – and other militant Islamic groups – had trumped Al Qaeda as a force of unparalleled violence.

Daesh made no secret of its attempt to eliminate the presence of Christianity in the lands under its control. The militants claimed responsibility for video footage clearly showing churches being ransacked, icons defaced and crosses and bells thrown to the ground and replaced by the Islamists' infamous black flags.

Syria: Jesuit priest shot dead in the city of Homs
April 2014: A 75-year-old Dutch Jesuit priest living and working in Syria for nearly 50 years was killed by an unknown assassin. Father Frans van der Lugt had immersed himself in Syrian culture and became an advocate of the poor and needy regardless of religion. For three years he stayed with his people in Homs while the city was under siege. Despite his age, he refused offers to evacuate him and he continued to minister to people and promote reconciliation between different religious groups. Aid to the Church in Need emergency relief was spirited into the Christian quarter of the Old City of Homs where Fr. Frans lived and he distributed it to the dwindling community there.

When the Nineveh plains were about to fall to Daesh, the decision by bishops and priests to evacuate the area quickly may well have averted countless deaths.

But it did not end there and graphic images issued via new media showed the savage killing of innocent believers.

Ethnic cleansing prompted by the threat of genocide

In late October 2013, Islamists seized the largely Christian town of Saddad. When the town was liberated 10 days later, returnees discovered 30 bodies in two mass graves. The message was clear: if Christians – and others holding ‘heretical’ views – were caught within territory seized by Daesh and other extremist groups, they could expect torture and death.

The scale of the threat was recognized by Church leaders. When the Nineveh plains were about to fall to Daesh, the decision by bishops and priests to evacuate the area quickly may well have averted countless deaths. As Daesh seized key parts of Nineveh in August 2014, Chaldean Patriarch Louis Raphael I Sako of Baghdad said: “[Christians have] fled their villages and houses. Christians are walking on foot in Iraq’s searing summer heat towards [safety]. They are facing catastrophe and a real genocide.”

Christians fleeing in vast numbers

In this scenario of violence and threats, extremist groups – with substantial military, financial and organizational capacities and secret political support – have either swept aside the pre-existing order or drawn it into a bitter fight to the death. Whether caught in the crossfire or victims of religious hatred, Christians have had no option but to flee or die. In many of the countries reviewed in this report the faithful have experienced human rights violations tantamount to full-scale religio-ethnic cleansing. While it is not true to say that Christians have been killed en masse, the violence committed in their homelands in general and in many cases against them in particular has caused them to flee in vast numbers. They have effectively been wiped off the face of the earth not just in specific towns and cities but much further afield too.

The summer 2014 Daesh capture of Mosul and Nineveh in Iraq prompted a mass exodus of people of various faiths, including 120,000 Christians. For the first time in 1,800 years there was no Sunday Mass in Mosul. But there are other examples too. By May 2015, successive acts of violence by Islamist terror group Boko Haram had caused 100,000 Catholics alone to flee Nigeria’s largest diocese of Maiduguri in the north-east, with 350 churches destroyed and 22 out of 40 parish centers and chaplaincies deserted.

Elsewhere in Africa, Islamist violence clearly intended to intimidate Christians, destabilizing their presence. In Kenya, Islamists showed the extent of their reach in April 2015 by mounting an attack at Garissa University, singling out and butchering Christians and other non-Muslims.

In South Sudan, the almost complete evacuation of Christians from the Malakal area in spring 2014 was principally the product of a massive upsurge in sectarian or tribal conflict.

Extinction within a decade?

But looking longer term, the pattern of events points to a similar process of ethnic cleansing occurring over a much larger geographical area. The vast exodus of Christians from Syria, Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East highlights the very real possibility that Christianity could soon all but disappear from much of its ancient homeland. Christians in Iraq fell to as low as 275,000 in the period under review with at least half recently displaced. Many, if not most, of those who

North Korea: Escaping to embrace Christ

Tom* was tortured so badly he could no longer walk. Jailed after he dared to escape to neighboring China, he suffered torture at the hands of the authorities in North Korea. Realizing how ill he had become after being tortured, the authorities sent Tom home on bail for three days to recover. During that time he managed to escape for a second time. Helped by relatives he made it across the border to China again. But once more he was captured by Chinese authorities and sent to prison in Shanghai. In a cramped and dirty prison cell, Tom leafed through a tattered version of the Bible and recited his favorite Psalms. Tom told ACN: “I spoke to God and tried to make deals with him. I used to say: ‘Give me freedom and I will believe in you’.” Tom was eventually deported, but the Chinese authorities sent him to South Korea, where he was baptized.

Libya: Martyred by Daesh (ISIS)
February 2015: A group affiliated to Daesh released a video showing the beheading of 20 Egyptians and a north African man on a sea shore in Libya. The Coptic Christians, from poor parts of Egypt, were working in Libya as laborers to send money back home when they were kidnapped. The father of Abanub Ayyad Atiyyah, a 22-year-old commerce graduate who was killed, said: “I also relied on him to help with the expenses of the household and the costs of his brother’s education.” Coptic Orthodox Pope Tawadros II announced that they will be formally recognized as martyrs by the Church.

remain want to leave Iraq. The rate of decline from about one million in 2002–03 to about 700,000 in 2006,28 to below 300,000 today – shows that the Christian population has been hemorrhaging from Iraq at a rate of between 60,000 and 100,000 a year. These statistics suggest that unless there is a change for the better, Christianity will be all but extinct in Iraq within five years. Those who stay may yet find the contraction of the native Christian community and the continuing pressures too much to bear. Up to 50 percent of Christians still in Iraq have been internally displaced within the last 18 months, with the sack of Christian Mosul and Nineveh arguably tearing the heart out of the Church’s presence in the country.

Iraq’s declining Christian presence is mirrored in Syria, parts of Nigeria and elsewhere in Africa. Such an exodus has profound consequences, reaching far beyond the Christian community. The absence of Christians represents a crucial societal, organizational and cultural rupture with the past. Breaking from a process towards pluralism, this emptying of Christians from regions which had been their home for centuries, is bound to be seen by future historians as a decisive move towards religious totalitarianism. According to this model of society, not only does one religion take center stage but does so to the exclusion of others, crushing dissent underfoot. At the very least the disappearance of Christians – especially in the Middle East – damages the prospects of social cohesion. As HRH The Prince of Wales has said: “The decline of Christians in the [Middle East] represents a major blow to peace as Christians are part of the fabric of society, often acting as bridge-builders between other communities. This crucial role throughout Middle East society is one recognized by Muslims (who are not extremist) both Sunni or Shia, who attest to the fact that Christians are their friends and that their communities are needed.”29

In the face of a profound shift in the power balance in favor of extremist Islam, especially in the Middle East, events in Egypt showed a shift in the opposite direction. The 2011–13 period saw Islamism becoming increasingly institutionalized under President Morsi, and when he was ousted in the summer of 2013, his supporters and other radicals scapegoated Christians, carrying out a wave of attacks on churches.30 The rise to power of former General al-Sisi has apparently halted Islamist agendas, e.g. replacing Morsi’s pro-Shari’a constitution

Nigeria: Young girl kidnapped by Boko Haram escapes

January 2015: A 15-year-old girl managed to escape terrorist group Boko Haram after being kidnapped along with her mother and five brothers. Victoria Yohanna (right) and nearly 400 others were taken during the extremists’ assault on Baga in north-east Borno State. Called ‘infidels’, non-Muslim women were given the choice of converting or being killed. Some of the women were told that they would be married off to Boko Haram fighters. Victoria and her family managed to break free from the group when they were left unattended by militants who left the camp to conscript more young men into their ranks. The group walked for seven hours and were eventually rescued by government troops who transported them to Maiduguri by van.
Religions’ increasing identification with the nation state to the exclusion of other faith groups often took the form of anti-Christian intolerance.

Buddhist Extremism

Although Buddhism is usually seen as a religion of peace, a more militant strand of the religion has allied itself to nationalists, who regard it as the rightful national religion in Burma and Sri Lanka. Buddhist extremists in Sri Lanka have destroyed or forced the closure of numerous churches – 2014 saw about 60 churches and chapels attacked, which was down from 105 the previous year.33 The 2014 attacks included one where 11 Buddhist monks led a 250-strong mob against Holy Family Church in Asgiriya, Kandy District, dragging the minister and his wife out of their home and assaulting them.34 In both Sri Lanka and Burma, Muslims and Christians alike have been targeted as deviating from the national socio-religious norm. The Burmese military continued its campaign of repression against Christian ethnic minorities in Chin and Karen States in the north, during which Christian places of worship have been singled out for destruction, when nearby Buddhist temples went unharmed. In Chin state, Buddhist monks have been given land confiscated from local Christians and erected monasteries and pagodas on the sites. It seems that aspirational nationalist models are crossing boundaries, and paradoxically even religious divides. Dilantha Withanage, chief executive of Sri Lanka’s extremist Bodu Bala Sena movement, expressed admiration for India’s Hindutva Prime Minister Narendra Modi, saying: “There are lots of similarities between India and Sri Lanka… So Modi and his party is a great inspiration for us.”35 That a nationalist movement seeking to enshrine Buddhism can look to another which identifies with Hinduism, points to the emergence of a more nuanced and complex model of nationalism in the region.

Totalitarian and authoritarian regimes – suffocation, repression and intolerance

The evidence suggests that the situation for Christians has worsened in a number of communist and other countries with an authoritarian bent. North Korea carried out a fresh campaign of violence and other intimidation against the faithful as part of a clampdown on perceived dissent against the ‘juche’ isolationist regime and the pseudo-religious ideology surrounding the Kim dynasty.36 The killing of 33 Christians, who were accused of being spies,
Sudan: Sentenced to death for her Faith

June 2014: A Sudanese woman sentenced to death for apostasy was freed 18 months after being arrested. Meriam Ibrahim was jailed when she was eight months pregnant along with her 20-month-old son, after her relatives reported her to police for adultery after she married a Christian man. Her Ethiopian Orthodox mother had Meriam baptized as a baby. Her Muslim father left them when she just a few years old, yet the court ruled that she should have been raised in her absent father’s faith. Following pressure from international governments, Meriam was released and allowed to travel to the United States with her family. Source: Guardian, 06/24/14.

shed fresh light on the regime’s antipathy towards the faith group. As UK Parliamentarian Lord Alton has pointed out, the regime is keenly aware that Christians played a key role “in ending the military dictatorship” in neighboring South Korea. At least 10 percent of North Korea’s estimated 400,000–500,000 Christians are detained in labor camps. Prisoners in the camps are subject to torture, murder, rape, medical experimentation, forced labor, forced abortion and execution. Religious detainees routinely receive harsher treatment.

Similar persecution was noted in Eritrea where former prisoners have described physical abuse. Reportedly, up to 3,000 Eritreans – the majority of them Christian – are currently imprisoned for their religious beliefs. Church-state relations were soured by the regime’s angry response to the Catholic bishops’ June 2014 pastoral letter which said government policies were partly responsible for prompting mass emigration.

While there is latitude for worship in China and Vietnam, this is strictly controlled by the state, with severe sanctions for believers not worshipping in accordance with the state’s strictures. Vietnam’s Decree 92 has further restricted religious freedom, requiring groups to obtain permission for “religious meetings” and stipulating that priests undergo education programs, and submit formal requests to travel abroad or within the country’s regions. There are fears that a new law on religion, intended as a replacement to Decree 92, will cause further restriction. It is due to go before the legislature in late 2015 or 2016. In the north-west and the Central Highlands of Vietnam, Christian groups have continued to face problems. Following a 2012 directive from the Ministry of the Interior’s Committee on Religious Affairs there has been a clampdown on small house churches; and local governments refused to recognize the Catholic Church as legal in three of the country’s northern provinces.

According to one assessment, worshippers in China suffered the harshest persecution seen in over a decade in 2014: 449 Church leaders were detained in 2014 compared with 54 in 2013, and as of January 2015 Christian Solidarity Worldwide had noted more than 650 incidents of government aggression in Zhejiang province, involving the partial or full demolition of churches – many of which had already been registered and approved by the state. Increasingly, state registration is no guarantee

Iraq: Kidnapped and tortured by Islamist extremists

May 2015: A Chaldean priest currently coordinating ACN emergency aid for Christians who fled Daesh (ISIS) in northern Iraq, described how he narrowly escaped being killed by extremists who tortured him for nine days. Speaking to Aid to the Church in Need (UK)’s national director Neville Kyrke-Smith during a visit to Erbil, Iraq, Father Douglas (right seen here with staff from ACN) described how during the time he was kept prisoner, he was beaten and tortured. His face and knees were struck with a hammer and his back was badly broken. “When I was kidnapped they told me I was the first not to beg for my life. I told them I believed in an afterlife. They saw I wasn’t afraid.”
of protection from persecution. Cardinal Joseph Zen Ze-kiun, Emeritus Bishop of Hong Kong, told Aid to the Church in Need: "The Chinese government has intensified the persecution recently. We have seen demolished churches, crosses taken away from the buildings, therefore there’s not much we can hope for immediately. The Church is still enslaved to the government." 44

Events in Cuba were by contrast a sign of hope, as witnessed by the May 2015 meeting between Pope Francis and Cuban leader Raúl Castro. Cuban Communism and the Catholic Church, enemies of old, now seemed poised for reconciliation. But reports stated that Christians in Cuba continued to suffer state intolerance. 45

Russia and Turkey – Keeping Christians under close control

Russia, while much improved since communist times, has used legislation dealing with illegal meetings, demonstrations, procession, and protests (Article 20.2, Part 2) to charge and oppress Christians meeting in rented cafés, cinemas, cultural centers, streets, playgrounds and public squares, even prosecuting believers for meeting in a private home. According to Forum 18: "Twenty three cases are known to have been brought against religious communities or individuals under Article 20.2, Part 2" 46 Similarly Christian-run centers have been charged with "illegal activity" under various regulations. In one instance a Baptist-run rehabilitation center in the village of Krasny Luch in Shakhty District was raided on suspicion of "illegal detention, forced manual labor, drug possession and illegal business activities." 47 Police failed to find evidence of illegal behavior. Since Crimea fell under Russian rule in March 2014 the ban on "extremist" religious literature has also been extended to the region and all books in this category had to be turned over to authorities by the end of 2014. 48

Turkey has exhibited a similar tight control of religion over the years, and continues to place restrictions on non-Muslim groups, despite President Recep Erdogan’s ostensible bids towards liberalization in this area. Positive moves include a 2011 decree allowing the three non-Islamic minorities recognized by the 1923 Treaty of Lausanne – Greek Orthodox, Armenian Apostolic and Jews – to apply for properties seized by the government to be returned or compensated. 307 were returned – representing just under a quarter of the requests received by the beginning of 2014. Culturally things look worse for Christians; museums that were originally churches have reverted to their use as mosques – and calls for this have mounted concerning Hagia Sophia, a museum since 1935. 49 Sporadic, isolated attacks on churches also continue. Erol Dora, the first and only Syriac member of parliament, put the country’s recent positive changes in perspective, when he said: "The scale of the discrimination becomes obvious when news of [the first new church in a century] being built is hailed as such a monumental event." 50

Conclusion

"We see today our persecuted brothers decapitated and crucified for their faith in Jesus before our eyes and often with our complicit silence." 51

Mindful of these words of Pope Francis from April 2015, this Persecuted and Forgotten? report seeks both to investigate the facts of Christian persecution in their proper context as well as draw attention to the scale of the crisis during the period under review. Violence against Christians was already so severe in the immediate run-up to the reporting period that in many countries it seemed inconceivable that it could get any worse; and yet, in many cases this is precisely what has happened. In fact, between 2013 and 2015, persecution intensified in more countries of greatest concern than over the previous two years – up from 13 to 15. The most significant finding for the period under review is that Christians in key countries – notably parts of the Middle East, but also regions of Africa – have fallen victim to a religiously-based ethnic cleansing powered by the fear – and sometimes the outright threat – of genocide.

Egypt: Sentenced to six years for ‘liking’ a Facebook page

June 2014: 29-year-old Kerolos Shouky Attallah was sentenced to six years in jail for ‘liking’ a Facebook page seen as critical of Islam. The Coptic Christian man did not post anything to the page and immediately removed his ‘like’ once he became aware some Muslims found the Arabic-language page for Christian converts from Islamic backgrounds offensive. Yet he was charged with blasphemy after being found guilty of violating the Egyptian Penal Code – Article 98(F), exploiting divine religion with a view to stirring up sedition. The severity of his sentence has shocked not only the Coptic Christian community, but also Facebook users in Egypt.

Violence against Christians was already so severe in the immediate run-up to the reporting period that in many countries it seemed inconceivable that it could get any worse; and yet, in many cases this is precisely what has happened.

Widespread concerns about mass killing were to a large extent justified by reports of Christians being killed – even on occasions entire communities. Perpetrated by extremist Islamists, even more violent than Al Qaeda and other movements which preceded them, this violence has resulted in a massive exodus of Christians which could yet cause a complete wipe-out within a decade in places such as Iraq. Previously significant both in numbers and influence, these Christian communities have been in many cases scattered and forced to find refuge elsewhere. The story of their exodus is part of the mosaic of catastrophic developments that explain record numbers of refugees, as revealed by the United Nations in the summer of 2015.

While the threat of Islamist violence against Christians is of pre-eminent concern, the rise of other religious extremist movements has represented a major setback; in the likes of Sri Lanka and India, Christians are under threat from radical Buddhists and Hindus. Similarly there is little good news coming from countries run by totalitarian regimes such as China and North Korea. In these countries there has been a turn for the worse, with Christians increasingly suffocated by communist and other authorities.

As a Catholic charity committed to helping Christians who suffer for their faith, Aid to the Church in Need is determined to do everything possible to help. Practical, pastoral help is the charity’s core objective, supporting priests, Sisters and the faithful to proclaim the Gospel and promote Christian values – especially through faith formation. In a time of increasing humanitarian crises, especially in Iraq and Syria, ACN is offering food, medicine and shelter. But aid is one thing, combating ignorance and misinformation is quite another. Time and again, the bishops with whom the charity works in 140 countries worldwide, call on the charity to raise awareness around the world about the plight of Christians who suffer. In a world that moves ever faster, they are increasingly aware of the need to grasp what few opportunities they have to speak out with prophetic voices for their persecuted people. Church leaders, especially in the Middle East, have increasingly made plain their disappointment with the West for – as they see it – abandoning them to their fate. And they say that the West has added responsibility since in their view it was intervention by governments in the West that directly led to the crisis they now face. Speaking at a seminar in France in March 2014, Chaldean Patriarch Louis Raphael I Sako of Baghdad said:

"Interventions [by the West] in Afghanistan, Iraq, and Libya have not all helped to solve the problem of their peoples. On the contrary, they have led to chaos and conflict that do not bode well for the future, especially for Christians. . . 1,400 years of Islam have not been able to take us away from our lands and our churches; now Western policy has scattered us to the four corners of the earth. More and more Christians are being victimized, and their exodus from the Middle East appears unstoppable."

By providing accurate information and clear analysis, this report aims to empower those people willing and able to ensure that persecuted Christians are never forgotten.

Where arrows are depicted in outline it means the countries have only got slightly better or slightly worse.

This table provides a comparison of the 19 countries assessed in both the 2011–13 and 2013–15 report. The other three examined in 2013–15 were not included in the previous analysis, namely Kenya, Russia and Ukraine.

In assessing the scale of oppression and persecution of Christians, ACN has considered many factors and drawn on a number of sources to make its final assessment. However, this sort of assessment is difficult to make for several reasons: i) acts of oppression and persecution are of different types, e.g. state suppression is different than acts of physical violence; ii) such conditions are frequently not uniform across a country or state; iii) the difficulties of getting information from some states or regions within countries;

Country-Specific Analysis

- North Korea: Christians have now been executed for their faith under Kim Jong-un. Reports still suggest there are around 200,000 Christians in prison or in labor camps.

- Pakistan: Terrorist organizations have targeted churches, as government has become less responsive to acts of violence against Christians.

- Saudi Arabia: Saudi Arabia has one of the worst records regarding abuse of religious freedom and the new king has heralded a more hard-line approach.

- Sri Lanka: Christians and Muslims alike have been subjected to hate speech and violence by Buddhist extremists, who have destroyed or forcibly closed numerous churches.

- Sudan: As President Omar al-Bashir stepped up the increasingly hard-line ultra-orthodox Islamist agenda, the number of Christians in Sudan has declined rapidly.

- Syria: Christians in Syria are targeted by militants and extremists because of their faith and have been driven from their homes. Priests and bishops have been kidnapped.

- Turkey: Christians are still seen as second-class citizens. Despite reform efforts by the government, there are concerns about the rise of radical Islamism.

- Turkmenistan: A new administrative code introduced in January 2014 increased punishments for ‘illegal’ unregistered religious groups. Many Christians are forced to worship in secret.

- Vietnam: The government continues to control religious activities and repress groups challenging its authority. Attacks on Church buildings and imprisonment of believers continue.

iv) the nature of ACN’s qualitative assessment. In making this assessment it has drawn on other analyses such as the Pew Forum’s Social Hostilities Index and Open Door’s World Watch List, although taking into account that these are based on different periods. Ultimately there is necessarily a subjective element in a qualitative analysis of this kind.
